

Growing Up in a Migrating China:
Family Mobility and Children's Developmental Outcomes

Over the past two decades, changing patterns of internal migration in China have reshaped children's living arrangements and everyday lives. Professor Lyu will trace the shift toward family migration while highlighting the diversity of children's experiences, including parental separation, co-migration, and return migration. Drawing on quantitative analyses of China's population censuses, time-use surveys, and other relevant survey data, together with field interviews conducted by her research team, she will examine how different family arrangements and migration trajectories are associated with children's time use, educational opportunities, and subjective well-being.
